

The Invisible Load Audit

What you're carrying that nobody sees.

A private worksheet for naming what you've been holding — and the slow, ordinary work of putting it down.

01 Name What's In the Bag

- What's one thing you've been carrying silently for more than three months — an unresolved argument, a loss, a disappointment, a version of events nobody else witnessed?
- When did you last say "I'm fine" and mean something else entirely? What were you actually feeling underneath that sentence?
- Is there something you stopped talking about — not because it was resolved, but because you got tired of carrying it in conversation too?

your response

02 Map the Cognitive Tax

- Where does this invisible load show up in your daily life — 2 a.m. replays, reduced patience, difficulty concentrating, a kind of emotional flatness?
- Estimate honestly: how many hours per week do you spend mentally managing this unresolved thing — replaying, suppressing, or bracing against it?
- What task or relationship is getting a diminished version of you because of what you're quietly carrying?

your response

03 Track the Leak

- Who in your life gets the "slightly less" version of you because of what you're holding — less patience, less presence, more distance?
- Think of a recent moment where your reaction was bigger or colder than the situation warranted. What was actually underneath it?
- Is there someone you're keeping at arm's length — not because you don't want closeness, but because closeness feels unsafe right now?

your response

04 Understand Why You Haven't Put It Down

- Finish this sentence honestly: "If I actually looked at this thing directly, I'd have to admit _____."
- Have you made "handling it" part of your identity? What would it mean about you if you needed help with this?
- What's the story you've told yourself about why you can't or shouldn't process this yet?

your response

05 One Small Act of Putting It Down

- The work rarely looks dramatic. What is one small, private act that would be honest about what you're carrying — writing it down, saying it aloud to yourself, telling one person, booking a session with a therapist?
- What does "resolution" actually need to look like for this particular thing — not closure necessarily, but something less than carrying it alone?
- Write a single sentence that names what you've been holding. Not to share. Just so it exists somewhere outside your head.

your response